The author tells us that 'civilization' is not more than hundred years old. Many food items like bread, jam and wine which were made at home are now made in the factory. The modern labourer in a factory inspects a machine punching out biscuits. This is in total contrast to the self-reliance of a labourer of the pre-industrial age. The author quotes Mr. Austin Freeman, a writer, to substantiate the fact that savages can face natural calamities better. Freeman narrates the construction of a set of water proof seeps by the natives of Central Africa when his Caravan was struck in a storm. The author would appreciate such self-reliance in a modern man.
